OPPOSITE TOP: Pollen fan
 Pollen and nectar are the only source of food for the sweat bees, or Halictus, and the females collect it to provide a food store for larvae. The eggs are laid in underground nests.

OPPOSITE BOTTOM: Metallic green
 Most sweat bees have a shiny green body. However, many species also show off the warning stripes of other kinds of bee. This is an example of mimicry, where all warn its attackers to beware of a sting. Sweat bees can sting but the weapon is not a powerful one.

 The sweat bee family comprises more than 3,100 species, making it the second largest bee family. Most species are small for bees, measuring between 6 and 8mm (0.24 and 0.31in).

 As the name suggests, this African species makes its life in the trees, hunting for insects from a branch.

RIGHT: Oriental dwarf kingfisher
 As its name, this Asian species is typically about half the size of its cousins at about 14cm (5in) long.

CRIME AND THE PARANORMAL

Even as far back as the 13th century the Chinese appreciated that, at a crime scene, “the difference of a hair” could change whether or not a crime was solved. Since then, criminal investigators have learned how to interpret vital testimony that is written in the language of fingerprints and flakes of skin, gradients of teeth and bone, splashes of blood, flecks of paint and traces of chemicals, a splinter of glass, or a uniquely striated bullet.

Amber’s crime and paranormal titles explore everything from the geographic profiling of a serial killer to deploying psychic detectives to help resolve longstanding murders.

Review: Abandoned World War II Aircraft, Tanks & Warships

This fascinating coffee table book sits at the intersection of history and travel with an impressive collection of photographs of artifacts that litter the globe.... While the photos are the book's biggest draw, the well researched captions are its best attribute, offering much needed context for many of the images, but also imparting interesting and lesser-known stories about the war in some of its most far-flung locales. read it. HISTORY

Amber offers hundreds of history titles, ranging from a compact pictorial account of the infamous sinking of the Titanic passenger liner by an iceberg in 1912, to Queens, a new illustrated guide to the greatest queens, consorts and empresses from Europe to Japan and everywhere in between. Other highlights include a photographic guide to the 1986 nuclear disaster in Chernobyl, and the impact of the catastrophe on the surrounding area decades later.

MILITARY ATLASES

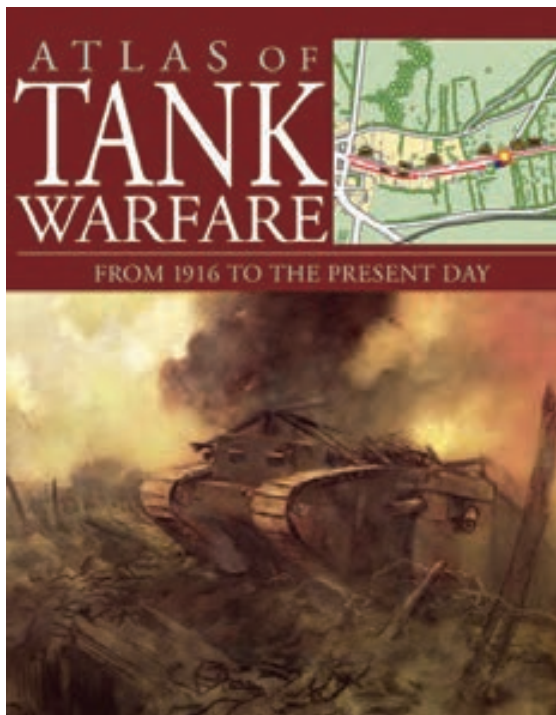

Amber's military atlases provide comprehensive visual and guides to key conflicts and warfare. With extensive organizational diagrams and dynamic full-colour maps created by an expert cartographer, each atlas details the strengths and organisational structures by campaign and major battle. Detailed examinations provide a key insight for each atlas, forming a key resource for students and experts alike.

In Chapter 3, Russian intelligence, reconnaissance and surveillance (ISR) UAVs, such as the Orion 10, greatly reduced the time between target identification and an artillery fire mission. Whereas conventional spotting methods would take between 20 and 30 minutes between identification and firing, the UAVs cut this down to about five minutes. Due to the effectiveness of intelligence, surveillance and reconnaissance UAVs, it is no surprise that both sides made a high priority of either jamming UAVs or shooting them down. As the war continued and more and more specifically military drones were lost, both sides and Ukraine in particular started to replace their expensive purpose-built advanced technology military UAVs with adapted commercial models, thus significantly reducing costs. Due to the comparatively limited resources on the Ukrainian side, including artillery shells, the UAVs were an effective means of making each shot count, rather than expending large numbers of shells in a barrage that might or might not hit the target. To counter this, the Russian side used radar jamming against Ukrainian military UAVs and electronic measures against commercial UAVs in order to disrupt their signals. This battle between the UAVs, including the measures used to counter them, would help to shape warfare of the future.

range, altitude and payload over previous systems. The Gray Eagle's design brief covered a variety of challenging service requirements that included persistent reconnaissance, surveillance and target acquisition (RSTA) as well as attack operations. Although early versions of the Gray Eagle exhibited reliability issues, these were addressed by the manufacturers when in July 2013 an improved Gray Eagle was launched. The new model featured improved fuel and payload capacity as well as a modified Lycoming (DEL-120) Heavy Fuel Engine (HFE). The engine is designed to run on either jet fuel or diesel to support the US Army's "single fuel in the battlefield" concept. The Gray Eagle is also fitted with an automatic take-off and landing system.

The improved Gray Eagle (GE) made enough of an impression for the US Army to order it for its intelligence and special forces groups. Deliveries were made to 160th Special Operations Aviation Regiment (Airborne) (160th SOAR) with a target of 12 aircraft each for two SOAR companies. Each package of 12 aircraft is accompanied by a support system that includes six universal ground control systems, two ground data terminals, 12 mobile ground control stations; one ground data terminal; Light Mobile Tactical Vehicles (LMTVs) and other ground support assets operated and maintained by a company of 103 soldiers. In June 2022, it was reported that the US Government were considering the sale of four MQ-1C medium-altitude long-endurance (MALE) drones to Ukraine. This would give extra offensive ability to the Ukrainian forces, but would also require considerable training for operators to manage this sophisticated system.

Polaris MRZR D2 and D4 Light Tactical Military Vehicles

The MRZR vehicles are fast, light and highly mobile, providing expeditionary forces with the ability to tackle challenging off-road terrain to achieve their objectives. The vehicles come in various forms, including patrol and scout, with capacity ranging from two to six personnel, depending on the version. Designed to be deployed in forward areas, the vehicles can carry troops along with their essential equipment, along with enough armament for defence and attack. Although they lack armour protection, the MRZR vehicles use speed and off-road mobility to evade enemy contact when necessary, though the vehicles can also be used for lightning raids. They can travel over terrain that would not be accessible to larger vehicles. Roll-over bars provide protection for the crew, and they can be easily folded when the vehicle is loaded into an aircraft.

There is a small cargo area at the rear of the vehicle that can be adapted in various ways, either to carry equipment and supplies, such as spare fuel and water, or to be used for stretchers. It can also carry extra crew if necessary on two rear-facing seats. If more carrying capacity is needed, a special off-road trailer can be towed, adding 454 kg (1,000 lb) of capacity. The patrol versions are powered by a three-cylinder Polaris ProStar 900 petrol engine. The scout version is powered by a Kohler turbo-diesel engine. The MRZR features a system whereby the standard two-wheel drive can switch automatically to four-wheel drive when extra traction is required. The transmission is automatic and continuously variable. Power steering reduces driver strain in rough terrain. The vehicles are fitted with independent dual A-arm suspension at the front and independent trailing arms at the rear. The vehicles can be fitted with 5.56mm (0.214 in) or 7.62mm (0.3 in) machine guns or with a 40mm (1.6 in) grenade launcher for either defence or attack. The open structure allows crew to use their personal weapons for defence or assault. An infrared (IR) light can be used when driving in black-out mode at night. The vehicle can also be fitted with durable MOLLE-covered roof panels for overhead protection from the elements.

MRZR D2

The MRZR D2 is a model of compact design, providing special forces with mobility along with easy transportation of their essential equipment.

MOTORCYCLES & QUAD BIKES

Motorcycles in World War I were highly prized as a means of sending messages at a time when battlefield telephone communications were rather basic. Dispatch riders whizzed around on hazardous roads, dodging sniper fire to deliver vital orders.

When World War II broke out, most of the British motorcycle manufacturers were given contracts to supply military specification motorcycles. BSA would produce 130,000 of its M20 model alongside its armaments production. Triumph was also heavily involved in production, despite being in Coventry factory to German bombs. Norton produced its 19H and Fig 4 motorcycles, while Royal Enfield produced the W30RE 'Flying Fox', a mini-motorcycle small enough to be carried by airborne forces. In the United States, Harley-Davidson produced its classic WL model, which would also have a profound influence in the post-war era on bike culture. Although some British models, such as the Norton Fig 4, were also produced with a sidecar, the real experts in this area proved to be the Germans. The Blindeku that took Europe by storm relied upon speed and the speedhead was often fast-moving motorcycle and sidecar units. These K2 reconnaissance units, organised within panzer formations, carried out rapid mobile assault and reconnaissance. German industry produced a wide variety of motorcycles for the Wehrmacht, including the BMW R75 and sidecar, the

HARLEY-DAVIDSON WLA

The Harley-Davidson WLA was one of the most widely used motorcycles by US and Allied forces during World War II. Reconnaissance units such as these were usually used to dispatch riders or for scout duties.

124

MOTORCYCLES & QUAD BIKES

DKW RT125 and NZ250, a variety of models by NSU, and the Zundapp 600cc K5W sidecar rigs, including the KS 750 flat twin. Other countries produced their own motorcycles, including Belgium with its FN M12 military model, and France with its Gnome-Rhône 750 ATmc.

While the Blindeku in Western Europe mostly happened during hot summer weather when the ground was dry, the invasion of Soviet Russia in Operation Barbarossa soon ran into the Russian winter and the same motif. Vehicles of all types were bogged down and the heavy motorcycles, with their low ground clearance, fared badly. Their low-hang air filter filled with mud, which also got into the motors. In many ways, the era of the big military motorcycle was over.

Something else had happened that pushed the military motorcycle into the sidelines – the 'Willy Jeep'. Here was a four-wheel drive light vehicle with plenty of power that could go almost everywhere and was both rugged and stable. Looking forward to the first Gulf War in 1991, the motorcycles that made brief appearances were somewhat different to those of World War II predecessors. There were high-rising trail bikes bred to tackle rough terrain. Stable and speedy, they presented a size profile and were seen about of special forces columns, probing the Iraqi desert ready to amplify report back on any signs of trouble.

Special Forces Land Vehicles

Since the inception of Special Forces units during the early years of World War II, unique and operation-specific vehicles have been developed for units that work in extreme environments and behind enemy lines, often moving quickly and with stealth to strike when least expected. Many of the vehicles are designed for special terrain, and can operate in either the desert or Arctic, while some can be dropped from aircraft or deployed amphibiously.

World War II Tanks: Western Allies 1939-45
This is a fine book, beautifully reproduced. You get high-quality side elevations in colour of just about every tank used by the western allies. ... The book includes brief details of each armoured vehicle used, some very well chosen photographs of tanks in action and, finally, some really interesting appendices.
