Cooling down
One of the ways that crocodiles can control their body temperature if they are getting too hot basking in the sun is by resting with their mouths open in this way. This is described as "mouth gaping". Unlike us, crocodiles cannot sweat to cool down.

Hiding away
The eyes of crocodilians are high up on the head, which helps to conceal the rest of their bodies in the water without compromising their ability to see around them.

Hope for the future
This crocodile is one of four species that are critically endangered. It is restricted to limited areas in Colombia and Venezuela. A captive-breeding programme has helped to boost the numbers of the surviving wild population.

Torensluis bridge
Completed in the mid-17th century and measuring around 42 metres (138ft) in width, the Torensluis (Tower lock) is the city's widest bridge – and one of its oldest. The vast size – and the name – is down to the tower that originally stood on the site until its demolition in the mid-19th century; the foundations of which are still visible both in the paving of the bridge itself and in the dungeon below.
