This is the story of Otto, a little dog who, every spring, walks along the path of the wall to a strawberry field to enjoy the delicious fruit. But one day, he finds a huge stone in the path that blocks his way. First, he got angry with the stone, but the stone didn't move, he got angry with the mountain, he got angry with his fate, with the world! He screamed, complained and kicked... until he got tired and was able to see far beyond the stone that blocked his way.

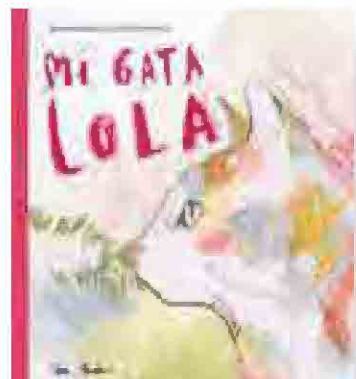

An album about changing perspective and making obstacles a means to find new paths. A fun, tender, simple album. Because sometimes to overcome problems we only need a small change of attitude.

Juan Arjona, one of the best children's authors in our country, returns with a tribute to the freshness of childhood, imagination and everyday life, narrated with the dual vision of the child and the adults. The illustrations by Christian Inaraja complete this endearing proposal, ideal for laughing with the family.

The protagonist does not share his parents' vision when they reproach him for having lost his shoes while playing, when they ask him to take a quick shower or complain about having to reread the same book as the last hundred nights. He does not understand what is wrong, nor does he know how to do it any other way, because he is a child, with all his defects and all his charms.

Carolo is a boy who feels like he doesn't fit in. His rhythm and way of seeing the world are far from his family's. He can't finish any of his daily tasks, something his family doesn't understand. So one day he sets out on a journey to show them that he is capable of carrying out great feats to the end.

A spectacular illustrated album by Nono Granero with epic scenarios that play with curved and square shapes to teach us that the world has many perspectives and sometimes we have to open our minds and empathize with those who are different, because they may be right.

Y de pronto... ¡de un salto cruzó un océano y aterrizó al otro lado!
"Uf, ese sí que fue un salto largo", pensó Igo, que estaba en África, aunque no tuviera ni idea de que eso era África.
"Bueno", se dijo, "aquí me echaré a descansar después de un viaje tan saltado".

A book that talks about communication, about love, a kind of visual poem that takes us by the hand through a series of illustrations that represent the human figure, the double page serves as a border between the two interlocutors of each scene and in them we intuit the words that remain implicit between both faces, sometimes they communicate, other times they are silent, sometimes they turn their backs on each other.

This book is a way to do it... without having to say a word, simply by giving this book, sharing it, reading it silently together.

Scientists share with children the infinite curiosity: Why? Why? For both, it is so important to ask questions because their discoveries depend on them. To do this, you have to start from what is known, but project yourself into the unknown to go beyond.

This book is an invitation to propose hypotheses based on imagination, which, although absurd and fun, must be argued as if they were the most serious discoveries in the world. You will also find real scientific curiosities so surprising that they seem invented, but no, they are totally true. It is about letting yourself be guided by intuition and good humor. A tribute to the curiosity that leads us to discover the world. To the impulse that unites feelings with thoughts, stimuli with the environment, the mind with the body.
