Trawl photographers and adventure enthusiasts Andy and Tia hit the road in the 1970s off-road back to 2010, driving over 35,000 km (22,000 miles) through the most remote parts of Australia. The longer the road, the more they love it. They spend their days chasing the perfect sunset, a morning on the beach and a night under the stars. They are not just looking for a place to sleep, but a place to live. They are not just looking for a place to sleep, but a place to live. They are not just looking for a place to sleep, but a place to live.

roadlife community is filled with kind-hearted souls eager to offer advice on local areas, and Andy and Tia's haven't run into any trouble yet. I mean sure and handy conversation flow whenever they advent leave their tent. The whole of the happy, it's bringing joy and good ideas to everyone they pass.

Andy and Tia have a far spookier than 10 years ago. They are now 40 and 42, and their journey is far from over. With the horizon to make up to a new place every day and no concrete plans on the horizon, they are content to simply explore and make whatever mistakes they can. They know that traveling in the dark doesn't always make for the most glamorous of lives. But they understand that most must the rewards that come from chasing the road less traveled.

Always chase the good weather. If you're not sure if it's your playground, and you'll have a much better experience when the weather is on your side.

MAKE A SIMPLE ALTERATION
TO A WELL-KNOWN PORTRAIT

WHAT TO DO

In 1919, Marcel Duchamp drew a ridiculous-looking moustache on a postcard image of Leonardo da Vinci's dourly enigmatic Mona Lisa. It was the kind of humorously undercutting gesture that the early twentieth-century anti-art movement specialised in. Select a postcard reproduction of a well-known portrait, pick up a pen and make an alteration to the face – add a chef's hat, shade in a beard, paint on lipstick, the more absurd the better...

CREATIVE TAKEAWAY?

A small gesture can make a big difference. Art sometimes takes itself too seriously – help it to remember the value of a sense of humour.

ARTISTS AT HOME

- A sneak peek inside the homes of some of the world's greatest artists, from William Morris' Red House to Salvador Dalí's flamboyant home in Portlligat.
- Artists at Home explores the minimalist and the cluttered, quiet retreats and collective hubs, lifelong homes and holiday escapes – each place as unique as the artists' personalities.
- The perfect combination of art history, interior design, and armchair travel. The stunning photography breathes life into the houses and inspires the reader to visit.

Cimetière du Père Lachaise

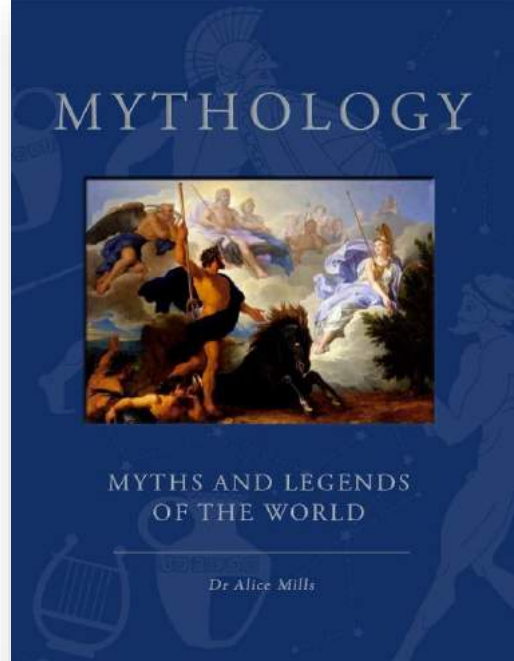

Paris, France
est. 1804

Père Lachaise is the most important cemetery in the modern history of the French city. Spanning 190 acres, the first constructed cemetery in the West is probably the most visited cemetery in the world. Prior to its creation, the bulk of Parisian burials were buried into unmarked mass graves in churches or buried together in mass graves like the Père Lachaise. As the industrial revolution concentrated the living into larger and ever denser cities, city authorities grew equally overwhelmed, drawing into existence shared plots where children and other donors buried.

In 1804, Napoleon Bonaparte visited with a not unlike a modern-day, neoclassical, and complex. With his blessing, Père Lachaise opened on 1 December — the week he was declared emperor. Based on French Enlightenment ideals, some of the cemetery's construction came down to the cemetery as part, with trees and benches, bookshelves, and other things that encouraged burial space purchase in perpetuity, survivors allowed to erect monuments to their dead.

The opening of Père Lachaise ran counter to 150 years of ecclesiastical history. From the first, Père Lachaise — though named for François-Louis de La Chaise, the confessor to Louis XIV, who once owned the land — was constructed on a wooded burial ground where all burials could be traced together. It was not an unmarked ground for mass burials, as others held in low esteem by the Church, such as the Church's destination of death was specifically reserved. However, the ground needed more than high stone to attract visitors. It needed a ground, that is to be returned to Père Lachaise were visitors and

Searching For What Remains of the Sea-cow & the Cormorant

After returning to the mainland in 1742, Steller went back to Kamchatka and continued exploring and observing wildlife. He then died from a fever on his way to St. Petersburg, aged just 37. His notebooks and writings survive, and I'd certainly urge you to read his detailed and moving observations of the sea-cow in his book De Bestia Marina ('On the Beasts of the Sea'). Steller's notebooks were copied and translated and his masterful descriptions of the sea-cow find the currency of scientists around the world, even though by now the animal was long extinct.

I wonder how many people raised their eyebrows at Steller's description of a two-ton sea creature which no other naturalist had ever seen. It wasn't until 1849—over 70 years after the animal was hunted to extinction—that the first bones were unearthed, and Steller's observations could be confirmed by other scientists.

Today, 27 nearly complete skeletons, and 62 complete skulls of Steller's sea-cow have been found, and these elephantine bones assure people in museums all over the world that surely nothing will ever compare to the enormous Steller must have experienced when he first encountered these incredible beasts in the bay off Bering Island in 1741. In November 2017, Marina Shitova—a researcher from the Commander Islands Nature and Biosphere Reserve—must have experienced something quite similar.

While reconstructing the coastline of Bering Island, Marina spotted several ribs sticking up from the ground 'like a fence'. After waiting for the weather to clear, her team began a four-hour excavation of a sea-cow skeleton. The skull was missing, but scientists estimate the animal had been nearly 30 feet long. This sea-cow will soon be on display in the small Akutan Museum of Natural History in Nikolskoye, the only village on Bering Island.

While sea-cow bones can be viewed in many museums, there are only seven specimens of spectacled cormorants left in the world. In Dresden, Leeds, Helsinki, St. Petersburg and in the Natural History Museum at Tring in England. Here, the ornithological collection houses 750,000 bird skins and includes one spectacled cormorant. With special permission from the museum,

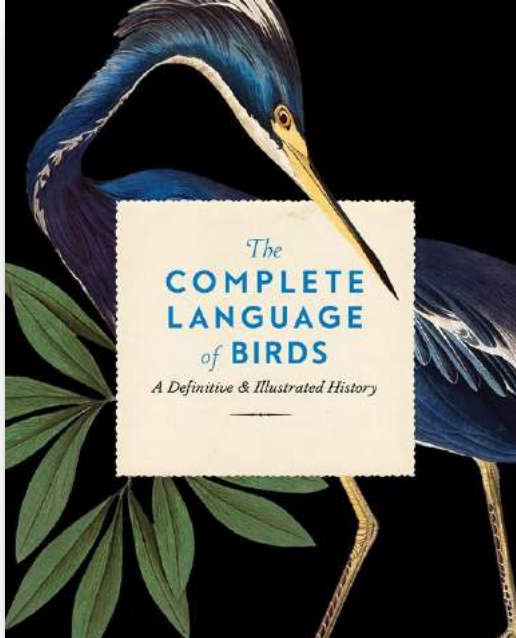

I undertook my own journey to view the remains of this bird. My expedition to Tring didn't suffer the same hardships as Steller (although I almost missed my connecting train and would have been rather late for my appointment).

Soon I was awaiting my appointment with an extinct seabird. As I waited I felt strangely anxious—as if I was about to meet a celebrity. Since my childhood I had obsessed over every detail of this bird's life: how it walked, how it swam, and how it had vanished from this planet 150 years ago. And now one was being carried towards me on a white, plastic tray. The museum curator reverently placed the tray in front of me and there I was, nose to nose with a spectacled cormorant. "May I pick it up?" I asked. In silent awe, I carefully cradled the cormorant with more care than I would when holding a friend's baby. As I lifted it, the bird's iridescent green feathers shimmered under the museum lights and brought the plumage back to life.

For a moment I imagined the spectacled cormorant swimming amongst the sea-cows in the bay off Bering Island, as Steller stood watching from the shore. And for a brief moment I felt a connection with that lost bird away and a time long gone. I remembered the dream of my childhood, imagining that somewhere on the planet there were still unknown animals on uncharted islands. Considering the fate of the spectacled cormorant and Steller's sea-cow, perhaps it's best they remain unknown.

WATER IN THE WILD

We rarely notice how much water we use when it's available at the tap. When we're camping, however, water consumption becomes an obvious and important consideration. Except for short trips of a day or two, you probably can't carry all the water you need, so you'll have to collect it as you go, and then make it safe to drink.

COLLECTING WATER

During vigorous physical activity in hot weather, your body may need as much as a quart of water every hour to replace what it loses through sweating, coughing, and urination. Over the course of a day, you may need nearly 7 gallons of water per person, plus additional for cooking, laundry, and other necessities. Plan on a minimum of 7 quarts of water per person, per day.

As you plan your trip, look for water sources along your route. Topography may show only larger ones, but trail maps and guides are likely to indicate small streams and springs, and to give some hints about their reliability.

Some of these sources, though, may dry up seasonally or in dry years. When hiking in areas where water sources are few and far between, ask rangers or other knowledgeable sources just before you set out whether specific sources are flowing. Plan to carry enough water to take you from one source to the next, with some margin for once should a source prove unexpectedly dry.

FINDING WATER

If a stream or brook in dry ground seems to be a good chance that you'll find surface water, if that doesn't work, look for an area where unusually lush vegetation is locally, and dig into the stream bed there. Or look for these hints:

VEGETATION. In otherwise dry country, look for patches of vegetation or stands of trees. They're probably feeding off a water source, even if it's underground.

CLIFFS. Water often seeps from between layers of exposed rock. The base of a cliff is a good place to look.

VALEYS. If water is flowing from anywhere on a hill or mountain, no matter how high or how deep beneath the ground surface, it will eventually make its way downhill.

ANIMAL SIGNS. Follow animal tracks or the flight paths of birds or bees. They all need water and know where to find it.

If the ground is even a bit moist, dig into it a foot or more and allow water to seep into the hole. In bogs or near dry ground, creep and crawl the first water that fills the hole, because it will be full of sediment. Then gently scoop out the second or third filling.

Following the contours of the land downhill will often lead you to a water source.

COLLECT RAINWATER

Keep your containers as full as possible for collecting water whenever the opportunity presents itself. The next expected water source might prove to be dry.

Collecting rainwater is easy. In a plastic sheet or a tarp, tubular or tent, and arrange it to funnel water into a pan or bucket. In areas without suitable tall vegetation, lay the tarp over a depression in the ground, then scoop up the collected water with a cup or soak it up with a clean rag and wring it into a good bottle. If you're using it into your water bottle. Rainwater is always drinkable, but if the tarp is dirty, you might need to filter it anyway.

TIPS FOR COLLECTING RAINWATER

- Wide-mouth water bottles or cups work better than military-style canteens.
- If the source is unreliable, so dip your bottle into, leaving it on the ground to make it deeper. With several attempts for practice to wring before collecting. After you're sure a clean cloth to absorb water to cleanse bottles, then wring it out into a pan.

What's a Supercar?
959 all-wheel drive on to
964 and beyond

Helmut Bott's race car designers had just started designing Porsche's new Group C contender, the Typ 959. Within days another trio came to see Bott: Peter Falk, Jürgen Barth, and Roland Kussmaul were the company's rally enthusiasts, and they brought a proposal for a car to compete in the World Rally Championship's (WRC) new Group B. Those were significantly modified production-based cars, replacing Group A, along with barely-modified Group 3 cars, the FA accepted for its rally series.
